Mary McLeod Bethune (Educator, Civil Rights Activist; 1875-1955)

Mary McLeod Bethune was one of the most influential Black women in the 20th century because of her extensive work to advocate for educational opportunities for all people. The daughter of freed slaves, Mary was not deterred by the obstacles or abuse she suffered in her quest to get an education. Seeking additional education, she attended Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. The only Black student on campus, Mary excelled in her studies and spiritual leadership. Enormous disappointment followed graduation when mission boards would not appoint her as a missionary to Africa because she was Black. Instead, she focused her attention on addressing the spiritual, educational, and physical needs of Black children in the United States. With a strong belief in God's calling and only $1.50, she founded the Daytona Literary and Industrial Training Institute for Negro Girls on October 3, 1904, which later became Bethune-Cookman University. She helped start the United Negro College Fund, was a member of President Roosevelt's "Black Cabinet," and helped integrate the Red Cross.

Mary's profound faith was integrated into all her endeavors. Writing about the purpose of her college, she wrote, "There is a crying need among us for women qualified as moral and Christian leaders. The Bible is prominent in every department of our work. It is the guide of our lives." In a history of Bethune-Cookman University, the authors concluded: "spiritual strength, race pride, interracial harmony, and faith in America's possibilities were at the core of Bethune's beliefs and advocacies." She was also the first honorary member of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority Inc., initiated in 1923.
